I just read the recent story on the Galaxy Tab. It appears that Saunders may have thrown Lyman under the bus to save herself. She probably made the call on the Galaxy Tab which was stupid to begin with. You don't single out a segment of the students and give them Galaxy Tabs. It appears that there may have been some kick backs involved in this case. Any idiot knows that in higher education you don't give equipment purchased with state funds or grants. She is not too bright. Furthermore, telling students that they can purchase the Tab after they graduate is just plain stupid.

I have an IPAD and IPAD 2. The IPAD3 will be out next March 2012, so why would I purchase, pending the year of my graduation, the IPAD or the IPAD 2, 3, or 4? Ditto with the Galaxy Tab, provided to me by KNO, a leading ebook company. In short, the next upgrade of the Tab, if it survives the market, as there are a slew of much better android tablets hitting the market early next year, will be the Tab 3. A graphic example is the HP TouchPad, an excellent tablet, but it simply could not compete with the IPAD, so they junked it. I was able to pick up this excellent tablet at a bargain basement price.

I wonder if Lyman is going to sue.
