

Niroomand Revisited Universities Recycle Problematic Administrators

Faculty who've been around for a decade or so are familiar with university practice of recycling administrators. The disservice of recycling is inadequate public history known about them. Of course, we're not referring to the public relations CV blather administrators publish about themselves. No, we're talking about well-documented behavior of recycled administrators.

A consequence is you are likely to be subject to the "leadership" of a recycled administrator. Here's one that made well-documented local history at the College of Business, University of Southern Mississippi. He is currently dean at University of Houston-Victoria.

Farhang Niroomand.

The special event giving rise to our current report of a recycled administrator is Niroomand's effort to recycle his administrative "leadership," again. Niroomand tried but failed in his recent effort to continue re-recycling himself. This time he failed at California State University-Fresno, Craig School of Business.

Hey, Fresno, you may never know how lucky you were.

Click on the following link for part of our documented history of Farhang Niroomand.

Many more reports are available at usmnews.net. Just enter "Niroomand" in usmnews.net's Google™ search box.