

One Pleasant Day in the CoB

Most people in the CoB could sense a change in the environment. It was intangible and not quite nameable at first, but it was real. People were just friendlier, happier, and maybe even a tad bit more optimistic. Employees seemed to do their jobs better and students seemed to try a little harder. After occasionally asking each other if anyone noticed anything different, the answer was discovered around quitting time: Sonia Gaines-Littles had taken the day off. While no one had the opportunity to fully enjoy it at that point, it explained a lot to everyone . . . but Dean Lance Nail.
